In its earlier years, Mac OS X enjoyed a near-absence of the types of malware and spyware that have affected Microsoft Windows users.[253][254][255]

macOS has a smaller usage share compared to Windows.[256] Worms, as well as potential vulnerabilities, were noted in 2006, which led some industry analysts and anti-virus companies to issue warnings that Apple's Mac OS X is not immune to malware.[257] Increasing market share coincided with additional reports of a variety of attacks.[258] In early 2011, Mac OS X experienced a large increase in malware attacks,[259] and malware such as Mac Defender, Mac Protector, and MacGuard was seen as an increasing problem for Mac users. At first, the malware installer required the user to enter the administrative password, but later versions installed without user input.[260] Initially, Apple's support staff were instructed not to assist in the removal of the malware or admit the existence of the malware issue, but as the malware spread, a support document was issued. Apple announced an OS X update to fix the problem. An estimated 100,000 users were affected.[261][262] Apple releases security updates for macOS regularly,[263] as well as signature files containing malware signatures for Xprotect, an anti-malware feature part of File Quarantine present since Mac OS X Snow Leopard.[264]
